Intrusion fantasy places less emphasis on elements typically associated with fantasy and sets a narrative in realistic environments with elements of the fantastical. Sometimes, there are just enough fantastical elements to make ambiguous the boundary between what is real and what is purely psychological or supernatural. The word "low" refers to the familiarity of the world within which fantasy elements appear and is not a remark on the work's overall quality.

Immortality in fiction In Natalie Babbitt's 1975 novel Tuck Everlasting, a family becomes immortal. Immortality is a common theme in fiction. Originally appearing in the domain of mythology, it has later become a recurring element in the genres of horror, science fiction, and fantasy. This view was challenged in the 20th century by writers such as George Bernard Shaw and Roger Zelazny. The concept has been depicted since the Epic of Gilgamesh, the oldest known work of fiction. For most of literary history, the dominant perspective has been that the desire for immortality is misguided, albeit strong; among the posited drawbacks are ennui, loneliness, and social stagnation. In stories such as William Godwin's 1799 novel St. Immortality is commonly obtained either from supernatural entities or objects such as the Fountain of Youth or through biological or technological means such as brain transplants.
